About Myself

With over a decade of experience in the advertising and branding industry, I am Rajesh Mohankumar, the Managing Director of TeamPluz Advertising Agency. Since founding the company in 2012 in Erode, I have been driven by a passion for creating innovative marketing solutions that empower brands to stand out and succeed in a competitive market place.

At TeamPluz, we specialize in a range of services from advertising and branding to digital marketing and event promotions helping businesses enhance their visibility and connect with their target audience effectively. My leadership is focused on fostering creativity, collaboration, and delivering results that exceed client expectations.

I take great pride in building long-term partnerships with our clients, ensuring that we not only meet but exceed their goals with each project we undertake. Whether it's a small local business or a large corporation, my goal is to provide solutions that are innovative, impactful, and tailored to the unique needs of each brand.

More Ideas

Do one thing at a time

The brain is a sequential processor, unable to pay attention to two things at the same time. Businesses and schools praise multitasking, but research clearly shows that it reduces productivity and increases mistakes. Try creating an interruption-free zone during the day—turn off your email, phone, and social-media sites—and see whether you get more done. If you have trouble untangling yourself, download software that blocks your access to certain websites for a certain amount of time that you specify.

Divide presentations into 10-minute segments

Remember my students who said they got bored in 10 minutes during a mediocre lecture? The 10-minute rule, which research has known for many years, provides a guide to creating presentations people can pay attention to. Here's the model I developed for giving a lecture, for which I was named the Hoechst Marion Roussel Teacher of the Year (awarded at one of the largest annual meetings in psychiatry).

I decided that every lecture I'd ever give would be organized in 10-minute segments, and that each segment would last only 10 minutes. Each segment would cover a single core concept—always general, and always explainable in one minute. The brain likes simple, general, and always explainable in one minute. The brain likes hierarchy, and the brain likes hierarchy. Start with the general concepts naturally leads to explaining information in a hierarchical fashion. Give the general idea first, before diving into details, and you will see a 40 percent improvement in understanding.

Each class was 50 minutes, so I could easily burn through five large concepts in a single period. I would use the other nine minutes in the segment to provide a detailed description of that single general concept. The trick was to ensure that each detail could be easily traced back to the general concept with minimal intellectual effort. I would regularly pause to explicitly explain the link. This is like allowing the guests to re-locate between stuffings. In addition to walking through the lecture plan at the beginning of the class, I sprinkled liberal repetitions of "where we are" throughout the hour.

This prevents the audience from trying to multitask. If the instructor physically leaves the room at the end of the presentation, the audience is forced to pay attention to the instructor and attempt to understand the material. I learned the hard way that it is not possible to pay attention to ANY two things at the same time. After 10 minutes had elapsed, I had to be honest with myself about the lecture concept. Why did I construct my lecture that way? I knew that I only had only about 600 seconds to make a right to be heard—the next hour would be useless. And I knew that I needed to do something after the 601st second to "buy" another 10 minutes.

Build the hook

After 10 minutes had elapsed, the audience's attention is getting ready to plummet to near zero. If something isn't done quickly, the students will end up in successively losing bouts of an effort to stay with me. What do they need? Not more information of the same type. Not an completely irrelevant cue that breaks them from their current thought, making the information stream seem disjointed, unorganized, and patronizing. They need something so compelling that they blast through the 10-minute barrier—something
